Eyes of the Woods

And, speaking of teenagers trapped in the forest, there's the not completely irredeemable, "Eyes of the Woods" (no relation to "The Woods Have Eyes"). The movie opens in bygone days, when pilgrims and other religious fanatics imagined Satan lurking behind every outhouse. One of the possessed pilgrims cuts a deal with the devil, allowing him time to avenge the death of his daughter. The bad news is that he's required to live in the woods, by himself, for hundreds of years, scaring the crap out of kids with his grotesque new costume. God forbid, if a pair of young lovers does the nasty within the monster's vicinity, because they're going to pay the ultimate price for their lust. There's nothing here we haven't seen in dozens of other genre specimens. In a real rarity, none of the people credited with directing, writing and starring in "Eyes of the Woods" has more than one credit on IMDB.com. – Gary Dretzka
