I Think We're Alone Now
4/10

Delving into the minds of two of Tiffany's stalkers. Yikes!

I Think We're Alone Now follows two obsessive fans of the 80s pop star Tiffany. The more obsessive of the two is Jeff Turner, an Asperger's sufferer in his fifties who lives an isolated life in Santa Cruz, California. This delusional man boasts about being Tiffany's stalker and of the restraining order taken out against him by the former singer. The second is Kelly McCormick, an intersex sports fanatic from Denver, Colorado. Kelly claims to have been a teenage friend of Tiffany's and that she used to talk on the phone to her a lot when they were youngsters.

While something like this could've potentially been quite funny as a spoof; the frightening reality is these two are the real deal. They really are obsessed with Tiffany and hope to one day be with her. It was disturbing to watch as we are taken through their homes - shrines to the object of their obsessions - and the fact that they both were unable to hold down jobs or live a normal lives outside of their infatuations.

This documentary was meant to be a combination of heartbreaking and humorous. But instead, all I felt was uncomfortable watching over an hour's worth of footage that showed two vulnerable individuals who clearly were in need of medical help in order to overcome why they feel the need to base their existences around a woman they barely even know. Instead, this film seemed like it was exploiting the subjects; encouraging their behaviour by sticking a camera in their faces and letting them ramble on about their odd fantasies.

Wrong on so many levels!
