Lust for Vengeance

Credits: MVD Entertainment Group

"Lust for Vengeance" was inspired by Giallo films. Giallo is the name for a distinct set of Italian thrillers from the 60s that combined crime, murder, eroticism, nudity, mystery, and whodunits, with stylish visuals. This concept was adapted in the U.S. into slasher films in the 70s. "Lust for Vengeance" was the first and only true Giallo film ever made in the U.S. to date, and this 10th anniversary explicit version contains extended scenes of sex & drug use.

For the inspiration of this film, director Sean Weathers ("House of the Damned") locked himself in a room for over a month watching over one hundred Italian thrillers. He paid close attention to the themes of complex murder mysteries that emphasized stylish visuals, techno scores, the whodunit element, violence, gore, large amounts of melodrama via Italy's long standing tradition of opera drama. These films also generally include liberal amounts of nudity and sex.

PLOT: Michael Richards is a rapist and murderer, but in his mind he's a victim out to get retribution against the women who have wronged him. The film uses the [[sequence approach]] and follows each of the five female leads as opposed to a time-line. The film shifts back and forth to follow the point of view of each of the women as they are stalked and haunted by the blood hunger psychopath. Each sequence shows the women engage in graphic drug use and sex, that both come off very real to the naked eye, and reveals a little bit more of the story before each woman is ultimately "judged" by Michael.
