We like to perceive that different eras come with their different cultural revolutions, which come with their musical revolutions. While such perceptions, even time itself, may be but perceptions, there's no arguing that once one new thing is successful, others will flower around it. So, let's accept the idea that the 90s was the rise of indie rock, the decade of the underground (eventually assimilated into the overground, or corporate musical America). A good – make that great – example of this is the band The Archers of Loaf, one of the underground/indie (undie?) acts that caught attention, earned acclaim and grew a fan base, a well-deserved one at that. Well, most bands break up, even great ones. But sometimes they get back together. That's the case here. The Archers of Loaf kick it large and live in their '11 get back together tour thingy. Feel the energy again, renewed, alive and coming right the fuck out of the screen at you! No, it's not 3D, but still ...
