Rudyard Kipling's Mark Of The Beast (Blood Bath Pictures/MVD DVD)

Picture: D Sound: D
Extras: D Main Program: C

A group of friends goes parting in the woods, but when one of them offends the "heathen gods" in the woods, a curse falls on them. Now, two brave souls must somehow drive out this demon from their friend... before they all end up dead.

As long as they don't trespass on the man-like creature's land, the lepers left them alone. But when a drunken friend desecrates their shrine, a terrible curse is placed on him to become a beast. Now, his two Christian friends must exorcise their demonically-possessed friend, but when their rituals fail they must capture one of the lepers and force it to lift the curse... by any means, including torture, burning and branding.

Never trust or bring a fat alcoholic friend in a horror story, it's more likely they will hurt someone or cause someone to die. This is a horror story of showing how Christians once believed in witch hunts and torture for those who believed in other religions, that the 'mark of the beast' are actually the scars and burns from torture. Ironically the supposed more 'civilized' civilization turns out to be more of the beast than the heathens. You have to see it to believe it... if you can see through the bad shooting and recoding. What would Kipling think?

Extras include commentary, documentary and trailer.
