THE PLOT

It incorporates a physical acting style that draws heavily from butoh, a form of Japanese dance. A young woman suffering strange hallucinations and physical ailments discovers that she is the descendant of an ancient line of European vampires, and she and her boyfriend are soon captured by older vampires and drawn into the darkness.

This is an odd one here, folks. The film is very art driven and I have to think that for the most of us it could be seen as too art driven. I like vampires as much as the next horror lover, but this one just hits a point about half way through where I lost interest and it was probably due to the odd way the director decided to go with the film. The film isn't even that long, but it goes with a style of old school silent films for a good portion of it. I guess with that style we should be half way happy it isn't that long.

The film was intended to go along with some music. I think the director should have done whatever was needed to get that music added in with the film. Maybe at the end of the day that is really what is missing from making the film a much more watchable affair. I think they got the vampire part right, it's just the other stuff that seems to fall flatter than a shook-up Coke bottle.
