After finishing any movie that comes my way I like to take a little time to myself to reflect upon what I've just fixed my eyes upon, then focus my attention on formatting in my brain how I want the words to spill out as I type...then sit back and read (and re-read...then edit) what I've thrown down. After watching "Trapped", and devoting 78 minutes of my not-so-precious time to it...my mind literally almost shut down..not due to the overwhelmingly terrible acting in this film, or the sad attempts at gore, or even the subject matter....but what was BEHIND the subject matter and the COMPLETE & HONEST TRUTH behind it. (For the people that haven't read many of my reviews, when I really want to emphasize something, I CAPITALIZE everything - some people say that this typing tactic is used to "shout" online.....not true, buckaroo...when I want to get a few words across that I truly believe to be gospel, it's time to ENLARGE THE TEXT.

Onto the film (or a mirror representation of our existence, sadly enough) - we begin at a birthday party for our main character, Laura (Aryanne Padilha). Attended by 6 of her friends, the party starts to take a downward turn when Laura and her embarrassingly inebriated father start arguing in the middle of the festivities...and things REALLY start to spiral into the porcelain when a psychotic killer crashes the fiesta and starts hacking away. Their only defense at the time is to lock themselves into the apartment's closet and wait it out....and they wait...and wait...you get the picture. Here's where it gets dicey (NO pun intended), the 6 remaining partygoers immediately take to their mobile devices to either call or text for help, or to simply pass the time while our resident lunatic picks off whomever shows up at the apartment (including the police who's uniforms slightly resemble an $8.00 an hour supermarket security officer....nice job, wardrobe department).

What our little merry band of tech-junkies doesn't know is that this little slaughter-fest is being broadcast WWW-wide for all to see (if I told you why this was going on it would ruin the movie....not that it's structural integrity is at an all-time high right now), but we are left to watch this small collection of malcontents piss & moan about cell reception and virtually everything else under the sun, at times almost forgetting that there is a fat, sweaty, disgusting serial killer just 7 or 8 feet outside their closet door wearing a dead-skin mask & showcasing his less than flattering man-boobs, all the while chowing down on their party refreshments - the nerve of some killers !

Like I said earlier, it's not the mangy, moth-riddled clumped assemblage of negatives being shoved in our faces here, it's the dead-facted ideology of how blind we've become as a society - without one of these devices in our mitts, we're generally useless - and I'm certainly NOT speaking for everyone as there are many people who know how & when to shut their little electronic friends off, but there are also loads of people who seemingly can't get dressed, eat, shower (or sadly enough, drive) without Facebooking, Tweeting, Instagramming, or Skyping about it - there is NO privacy any more, that's been made blatantly apparent, and this movie uses this sad state of affairs as a vehicle to drive home the point. If you look at it, you can see why the killer is offing these victims..ever wanted to punch that person yapping loudly into their phone while in the checkout line ? Or have you wished instant death upon the jackshaft that almost t-boned your car because they were gazing into the screen of their phone while reading a text from one of their BFF's ?

Maybe I've wandered off the beaten track a mile or two, but after watching "Trapped", I'm more depressed that I gave up almost an hour and a half to be reminded of how lazy society has gotten, it's even more of a shame that there was a cheesy movie wrapped around it as a showcase. My advice is to skip this birthday party and just mail in a gift....or stay locked in the closet...either way, you'll be destined to avoid this one at all costs.
