A wealth of political information

The Disinformation Co. first came to prominence in the world of politics-based DVDs more than four years ago, when George W. Bush was running for his second term. The company distributed Outfoxed, the exposé about Fox News from filmmaker Robert Greenwald's Brave New Films, known for producing docs that fall on the liberal side of politics. The film "broke new ground in how DVDs are marketed," says Gary Baddeley, Disinformation co-founder and president. Beginning with Outfoxed, Disinformation allied with MoveOn.org and other organizations to promote docs among their membership. Outfoxed also pioneered the house party screening concept, in which films are shown to interested groups at relatively small, intimate venues. Outfoxed unit sales surpassed six figures, according to Baddeley. But the market has changed since then, as anti-Bush fervor has died down with his impending exit, and there's a glut of political titles. Greenwald has since begun making shorts, which have received "millions of views" over the Internet, says Baddeley. Some of these shorts have been added to a special edition of Outfoxed, about to be released. Disinformation also has The Real McCain, which shows John McCain as a flip-flopper, using shorts produced by Greenwald with commentary from leaders of the progressive political movement. Also being released is Uncounted, a documentary on voting irregularities, which Baddeley says should interest people on both sides of politics. The company's mission, says Baddeley, is to "highlight issues that are not being given a fair shake in the major media." VB —C.S.
