Introduction

A film called Homeland Insecurity arrived through my letterbox the other day. The title looked interesting considering we live in a post 9/11 world. Wasn't completely sure about the blurb on the artwork though. Homeland Insecurity contains two short films about the hometown you're looking for and the hometown you've left behind. Er, ok.

The first film, about 15 minutes in length, is called Hub City and is a film about the strange weather in the skies above Lubbock, a town in Texas. This was the hometown of Buddy Holly and seemingly the hometown of filmmaker Bill Brown.

The second is really the main feature of the release called The Other Side and lasts 43 minutes. Bill Brown takes his camera on a 2000 mile trip along the US-Mexican border to investigate what has happened the US immigration policy since 9/11. He travels and gets contributions from the Samaritan Patrol, Humane Patrol, No More Deaths and Water Stations Project. All of these groups are volunteers who roam the border to make life easier for those looking to gain entry to the US. It's not about suborning the US immigration policy though, it's about valuing human life and trying to ensure that no one else dies in the attempt to reach another country.

Video/Visuals

It may be deliberate but the picture's not that great; blurry and out of focus in places, grainy and with print damage. It was only filmed in 2006 on 16mm so I'm guessing that Bill Brown was either using really old film stock or the picture design was deliberate. Either way, it should've been much better. A lot of the images are still shots of buildings with traffic passing in front of them or desert with little going on.

PCM soundtrack, which is fine, with filmmaker Bill Brown narrating the piece which is a mix of story and opinion but no subtitles.
