Homeland Insecurity is a curious set of three Indie documentaries, and generally I am a avid supporter of the Indie world, however Homeland Insecurity - although interesting - really didn't reach the heights that it could have.

Generally an Indie film maker will go through the effort of making a film simply because he can, and not for a huge pay cheque which is merely compensation from a capitalist venture for helping to portray their views. For this Bill Brown certainly deserves credit.

It is my opinion that Bill Brown is a talented film maker, he has a skilled eye for camera angle, and a nice way of tackling his subjects, but his narration and use of light is just not for me.

At times a piece of paper is held up in front of the camera, and no matter how many times I adjusted the screen settings, it was just impossible to read what was written. It is unclear if this was intentional, but even if it was it seems to be a very pointless exercise.

Bill Brown takes viewers with him on a journey along the borders, and documents everything along the way. It's an interesting concept and his unique style of film making adds to the overall feel, but it does dull through the camera and lighting issues.

It is the second short documentary that stands out more than the rest. Beautifully shot, with no spoken words.. a real elegant nod to a great talent.

Bill Brown's style is easy going, and his non judgmental approach is admirable. Where the DVD is worth a look, Brown isn't yet at the stage of a must-see film maker, even though the subject may be of interest.
