It's pretty hard to describe UFO to people that don't know much about them. Even more to the point, giving someone a record doesn't do this band much justice. UFO, with all their brilliant talent as musicians, are only best in the live setting. Their studio albums are always solid, but never really have stood out as "the best" representation of their sound. Yet, seeing them live truly defined this band. TOO HOT TO HANDLE was originally released in 1994 in Japan, and now comes to the USA for the first time. It's about time.

Wrapped in what is supposed to be the story of the band, this is more like a publicity video for guitar great Michael Schenker with a lot of killer live footage mixed in for good measure. It wins on all accounts.

TOO HOT TO HANDLE has interviews with the band members, which is always interesting. Pete Way, in particular, comes off fluent and coherent (something that is not always the case these days). Phil Mogg seems like he was always the glue that held the band together. Schenker was the superstar - full of ego, yet having the talent to back it up. People forget the overwhelming influence this band had on metal as a whole. Yet, it's so interesting to see interviews with guys like Steve Harris of Iron Maiden here where he absolutely admits that Pete Way influenced not only the way he plays on stage, but the way he dresses as well. Also featured are the Def Leppard guys sharing their feelings about the band as well.

PITRIFF RATING - 8/10.

UFO are one of those bands that just had "it". They recorded killer, memorable songs that are still potent to this day. Sure, a lot of their music didn't age well with time, but when you look back at what they were doing, only bands like Deep Purple or Black Sabbath were doing it better in their era. That says about all that needs to be said.
