If he can't be your dog, can he still be your teddy bear?

God Save the Queen CLEOPATRA

Never mind the Sex Pistols (because they're not accounted for here, mate): This bollocks-free sampler of U.S. and U.K. anarchy offers 21 vintage video clips from punk's festering, formative days of rage, with live performances from such artists as Johnny Thunders and Buzzcocks, all demonstrating a lack of manners but plenty of balls and wit. Highlights include Iggy Pop unleashing his raw power in Detroit as he barks out "I Wanna Be Your Dog" and Billy Idol honing his pout while fronting Generation X. No bonus features, but the no-frills package perfectly suits the stripped-down ethos within—we mean it, man! B+ FRANK HALPERIN

Rated R: Republicans in Hollywood DOCURAMA

Centered on Arnold Schwarzenegger's unlikely 2003 gubernatorial campaign, Jesse Moss' documentary on Republicans in Hollywood aims to be a kinder, gentler Fahrenheit 9/11. But in interviews with many of the entertainment biz's outspoken conservatives (including Drew Carey, Patricia Heaton, and Pat Sajak), Rated R emerges with little of interest other than their consistent complaints that the liberal elite isn't playing fair. The exception is the truly batshit Vincent Gallo, who mournfully wishes that he "looked more like George Will" and brilliantly summarizes how Super Bowl III helped form his political worldview. C+ SAUL AUSTERLITZ

Green Day: Bullet in a Bible REPRISE

Who would've thought the heir to David Lee Roth's king-of-stadium-rock throne would be a snotty punk kid from Berkeley? In this tour film, which captures Green Day at England's Milton Keynes National Bowl last summer, Billie Joe Armstrong kicks his way across a massive stage, taunts the crowd with call-and-response games, and even performs "Shout" while wearing a crown—all tactics lifted straight from the Diamond Dave playbook. While the backstage footage is little more than fluff, the show itself is refreshingly ostentatious—the only thing missing is a cover of "Panama." B+ KYLE ANDERSON

SCREEN GRAB

Paul Rudd →

"It was so short that it lasted negative time. Scientists have studied it—we actually time-traveled. I know for a fact, because after we finished, Lincoln had just been shot."
