With a title like, "Kids Go to the Woods ... Kids Get Dead," what's left to explain, except how well it holds up against all the other movies that could have been titled, "Kids Go to the Woods ... Kids Get Dead." The only fresh trick here is having everything that happens to the teenagers be prophesized in the novel being read by the younger brother of one of the campers. This includes the arrival of the crazed killer, whose disguise combines the scarier elements of scuba gear and a Hazmat uniform. If anyone survived the slaughter, which isn't limited to the outsiders, I can't remember who it was. Ultimately, it doesn't matter. Freshman writer/director Michael Hall adds a nice twist to the cliché device of having soiled virgins and their lovers die first. Here, all of the men believe they're going to get laid, primarily because the ladies lead them to believe they're hot to trot. Instead, the only campers to get lucky are the lesbian couple, much to the delight of the voyeuristic brother.
