

STRICKEN

Directed and Written by Matthew Scence

Stars: David Fine, Stephanie French and Christina L. Telfison

Reviewer: Char Hardin

“IT waits in the darkness”

Sarah Black's is young woman on the edge of losing her mind. Her father's recent "suicide" and startling nightmares that lead to horrific revelations is eviscerating her psyche. All around her is chaos and evil has started her own path of murder that leads a trail of murders back to Sarah Black.

Detective Scott Aro has been tracking a series of mysterious murders for 10 years and he believes in Sarah's innocence when the fingers are pointed at her at the death of a friend. Grisly murders and suspense lead to a climatic conclusion which involves a SOMETHING and not a SOMEONE in the Mirror.

Sorry for such a vague tone to my review, but I don't want to give away too much, Stricken was a decent little thriller and needs to be viewed with without any real knowledge or preview. I will say, being a fan of the Kiefer Sutherland movie MIRRORS, that I liked STRICKEN and how it involved the mirrors in this story and the introduction of some Gaelic folklore. I liked the twist and enjoyed the turns. Kills weren't majorly gory. It will change how you look at mirrors or make you think before looking into them. The movie is out on DVD and I recommend you look for it.

Final Note: Language, violence, brief nudity.

Rating: 6/10