All My Loving

Directed by: Tony Palmer

Release Date: 09.18.2007

Rating: 9 of 10

It's time to re-up because you probably missed it when it first aired in '68... After nearly forty years of dormancy, this controversial film reemerges out of the woodwork to re-slap audiences in the face, a tasty little wake up call for those who pressed the snooze button on the sirens of the 60s rock scene so long ago. Say that six times fast.

This remarkably relevant music documentary paints graphic pictures of the artists and the industry during the late 60s, drawing strikingly ironic comparisons to present day pop culture and adding fifty-two minutes of stimulating shock value to your DVD collection.

Acclaimed director Tony Palmer eerily delivers one brutally honest, raw and revealing short film about the pop biz and the fiery young talents that fueled it. Basically, this film blatantly rips the industry apart and turns it inside out, a shockingly graphic image to accompany a shockingly graphic and immensely provocative film.

With abnormal narrative and reserved diction, Palmer plays a psychotherapist rather than journalist, allowing for an uncanny, introspective look into the souls of Hendrix, Frank Zappa, Paul McCartney, Pink Floyd and Pete Townshend to name a few. McCartney and Jimi's levity brighten up the screen while Zappa and Townshend balance out the film with gravity and angst. In all, this film's delivery was perfect, forcing audiences to do nothing but shut the hell up and listen.
