"Seen through the eyes of the DEAD."

--THE PLOT

Colin is bitten by a zombie, dies and comes back to life as a zombie. He walks the streets feeding on people and sees other zombies feeding. Walking through a dilapidated London we see what Colin sees and are faced with some intense moments as the zombie Colin finds himself in various scenarios.

I won't give away too much plot but it follows one zombie and it doesn't tend to focus on a bigger picture such as why it happened. This premise isn't exactly new, but it makes it stand out a little bit more than another "I wish I was a Romero" zombie film, of which there are loads.

Presented in 4:3 full frame, the image quality is pretty terrible at times. Scenes where there are lots of black look very gritty and pixelated, and often throughout the film the footage looks as if it is glistening/blurring.

Given its low-budget this is understandable but on a 37" TV and played on a blu-ray player it looked pretty bad. Might look ok on a 21" CRT TV.

--AUDIO

Presented in a 5.1 soundtrack and the back of the case also states as a special feature that you have the choice of a Dolby Digital 2.0 or 5.1 soundtrack. I observed no major issues with the soundtrack.

Director's commentary is included as an extra.

--FINAL THOUGHTS

A decent film and not a film that you can't dismiss purely because of its budget. A lot of low-budget films are filled with tedious humour, bad acting and a bad script, Colin suffers from none of this. I've noticed a lot of low-budget films like Aah! Zombies!!, for example, don't have all that much blood and guts in them. Colin delivers plenty in the gore department. It also utilizes a pretty awesome sound-scape that is quite effective and eerie.

While the dialogue is quite minimal (there's none bar some grunts for the first 30 or so minutes), some may find it a bit slow, and some of the camerawork was a bit shaky and was quite nausea inducing at times, but apart from that I really can't fault it that much. It would have been better had the budget been bigger, the biggest flaw is the camerawork and poor lighting, that aside if you love zombie films then check it out.
